A Library Across the Water Passage B

A A small library served three villages around Lake Mere. The villages had schools but no public library, and the nearest town was an hour away by bus. Lina, a librarian, suggested carrying books on the morning ferry. Buying a special library boat would have cost too much. The ferry company agreed to carry six boxes once a week without charge because there was spare room outside the holiday season. Lina chose Tuesday, when the ferry also carried supplies to the villages.

B Each village provided a different place for the books. At East Bank, shelves stood inside a bakery. At Pine Shore, a school opened a room after lessons. Hill Point used its village office. Lina asked each village to choose a local helper, rather than asking everyone to travel to one central collection point. The helpers recorded loans in notebooks. Readers could request a book for the following week, but they could not keep the ferry waiting while they made their choices.

C The first delivery brought an unexpected difficulty. The ferry arrived on time, but the boxes became wet while helpers carried them along an uncovered path. The books inside were safe because Lina had wrapped them in plastic. She replaced the cardboard boxes with strong containers that had lids. Each container carried the name of its destination in large letters. Different colours were considered, but names were easier for the helpers to check against the delivery list.

A Library Across the Water Passage B

D The service changed reading habits in small ways. One retired mechanic began borrowing travel books and talking about them with neighbours. Children at Pine Shore started a lunchtime reading group, using books collected by their parents. Lina also added large-print books after a helper passed on a reader's request. She kept a list of requests from all three villages so that the busiest village would not automatically receive every new title. Books moved between the villages after six weeks.

E Winter required a different arrangement. Strong winds sometimes stopped the ferry, so Lina sent extra books before the coldest months. Notices explained that returns could wait when boats were cancelled; readers would not be charged for weather delays. A library website listed available titles, but telephone requests remained possible. At the end of the first year, the helpers said that a reliable collection point mattered more than a large building. Lina planned to keep using the existing ferry rather than buy a boat.
