Passage A

A The Brook Street Festival began as a meal shared by neighbours. Families brought food, children played games and older residents told stories about the area's history. There were no tickets. People could bring a dish or simply help put out chairs. After several years, visitor numbers grew. The organisers needed a plan because the same small team could no longer prepare everything. They wanted the festival to remain a local celebration, even when people from other towns came to enjoy it.

B The team asked residents to complete a survey about the programme. Many wanted traditional cooking demonstrations where they could learn to make a dish. There was less interest in a large commercial concert. Residents also asked for activities that children and grandparents could enjoy together. Organisers invited local cooks to show simple recipes and asked families to share old photographs. Visitors could watch, ask questions or take part. The programme was not a lesson with a test; it gave people a chance to talk about their lives.

C The festival introduced reusable cups and water stations. Food sellers paid a small deposit and received it back after sorting their waste. Signs showed which bins were for food, paper and other rubbish. Volunteers helped visitors who were unsure where to put things. This system reduced waste without making local stalls too expensive. Sellers could also borrow tables rather than buy new ones for a single day. The organisers explained these arrangements before the festival so that nobody had to guess the rules.

Passage A

D Growth still created problems. Streets became crowded, and some residents could not reach their homes by car. The next festival added delivery times and clear walking routes. It also introduced a quiet hour before the evening music. During this hour, people could visit the stalls without hearing loud speakers. The stage was moved farther from homes, and the music finished at nine. Families who wanted to leave earlier could use a marked route to the bus stop without walking through the stage audience.

E The festival still welcomes visitors, but organisers do not judge success only by attendance. They record waste, complaints and the number of local people taking part. After each event, a short meeting gives residents a chance to explain what worked and what did not. One year's popular activity may need to change the next year. A useful festival therefore needs both enjoyable entertainment and regular attention to the people who live nearby.
