Voices at Lantern Night Passage B

A In a coastal town, Lantern Night had once marked the return of fishing boats after winter. By the time student Mara joined its organising group, many young residents knew the name but not its story. Mara proposed an exhibition of recorded memories. She interviewed six older residents in their kitchens rather than inviting them onto a stage. Each conversation lasted about half an hour. She asked permission before recording and let the speakers choose which parts visitors could hear.

B The memories did not always agree. One person remembered red lanterns, while another remembered yellow ones. Mara first wanted to select a single correct account, but her teacher advised her to keep the differences. A photograph showed several colours in the same street. The exhibition therefore explained who had supplied each memory and when they had lived in the town. It presented personal experiences, not a complete official history. Speakers checked the short descriptions beside their recordings before anything was printed.

C The exhibition occupied an empty shop near the harbour for one evening. Visitors listened through headphones so that several recordings could play without disturbing each other. Printed transcripts were available for people who preferred to read. A volunteer translated the introductions into two additional languages, although the recordings remained in the speakers' original language. Children could place a paper lantern on a large map to show where their families had first lived in the town. No family address was displayed.

Voices at Lantern Night Passage B

D Heavy rain changed the planned outdoor ending. Instead of walking along the harbour with paper lanterns, visitors gathered in the covered fish market. A musician played a short tune mentioned in one interview. Mara then invited people to contribute one memory on a card. The cards were read aloud only with the writers' permission. This part took longer than expected, so the group shortened the final music performance. The shop exhibition closed at its advertised time, allowing volunteers to catch their usual buses.

E Afterwards, the library offered to keep copies of the recordings. Each speaker could still ask for a recording to be removed from public use. Mara saved the original interviews separately from the shorter exhibition versions and labelled both clearly. She also kept a note of questions that the recordings had not answered. The following year's students could investigate those questions or add new voices. For Mara, preserving a celebration meant keeping a conversation open, rather than repeating exactly the same programme forever.

Questions 11-15 Order and speak

Put sentences A-C in order. Record the opening, then read all three sentences in the correct order. Do not read the letters.

11. Suggest an activity for the group.

Opening: We need an idea that suits the whole group.

A	The workshop lets us make small gifts.
B	We could give those gifts to our families.
C	I think we should try the craft workshop.

12. Explain a preference politely.

Opening: I can see why you like the concert.

A	That event has dishes from several countries.
B	I would rather choose the food event.
C	Trying those dishes would be new for us.

13. Support a friend's suggestion.

Opening: Your idea sounds promising.

A	The parade passes right by our meeting place.
B	That location makes it easy for everyone to join us.
C	I agree that the parade is a good choice.

14. Explain why another plan may work better.

Opening: The late show may be difficult for some of us.

A	It finishes at four.
B	That early finish gives us time to get home.
C	I suggest the afternoon dance show instead.

15. Summarize a group decision.
