A Second Life for School Laptops Passage B

A In a school project, a cupboard contained twelve old laptops that teachers no longer used. The student technology club wanted to lend them to classmates who had no computer at home. Before promising anything, club leader Sami asked a technician to examine them. Four had faults that the club could not repair safely. The other eight worked, although some batteries lasted only a short time. The club kept those eight for the project and attached a note to each one describing its condition.

B Preparing the laptops took longer than cleaning their screens. The technician removed previous users' files and installed the school's approved software. Students checked the keyboards by typing a paragraph that used every letter. They tested the cameras, but did not require them for loans because the main purpose was reading and writing homework. Each laptop received a number on a removable label. The same number appeared on its charger, reducing the chance that equipment would be returned in the wrong set.

C Borrowing was arranged through the library. Students could take a laptop for one week and renew it if nobody else was waiting. They did not have to explain their family's income in front of classmates. Requests went directly to the librarian, who kept the list private. A short printed guide explained how to connect to the school network and save work. Borrowers were asked to save their documents elsewhere before returning a laptop, because personal files would be removed before the next loan.

A Second Life for School Laptops Passage B

D The first month revealed a practical problem. Several borrowers returned computers late because their lessons ended after the library closed. Sami suggested charging a fee, but the librarian first changed the return arrangement. A supervised desk near the school entrance accepted laptops for thirty minutes after the final lesson. Late returns then became less common. One borrower also reported a damaged charging cable. The club took that cable out of use and asked the technician for a replacement rather than attempting a repair itself.

E At the end of term, the club compared the lending records with anonymous comments. The records showed frequent loans, but comments explained that a computer was not enough for every student: some still lacked an internet connection at home. Teachers began providing downloadable reading files that could be opened offline. The club did not claim to have solved every homework difficulty. Its next plan was to improve the printed guide using borrowers' questions, while continuing the technician's regular equipment checks.
