Reading Homework 1

Book 2 Unit 4

Passage A

A At Rivergate School, hot afternoons were becoming difficult for students. Some classrooms felt uncomfortable after lunch, and teachers noticed that students asked for more breaks. The head teacher did not want to buy equipment before understanding the problem. She asked a science class to measure the temperature in eight rooms for four weeks. Students used the same kind of thermometer in every room and recorded results at the same times each day. They also noted whether sunlight was entering through the windows.

B The records showed that the rooms facing west were usually warmest in the afternoon. Two classrooms in the oldest building stayed cooler because large trees shaded their windows. This surprised students who had expected every old room to be uncomfortable. On cloudy days, the differences between rooms were smaller. The class put the results on a simple map, using orange for warmer rooms and blue for cooler ones. Teachers could then see which places needed attention first, instead of treating all classrooms in the same way.

C The school fitted outside blinds to the hottest windows. Staff also moved one afternoon reading class to a room on the other side of the building. New trees were planted beside the playground, although everyone understood that they would need time to grow. For the first summer, a covered area provided shade there. The school checked that its drinking-water stations worked before the warm season began. These changes used the existing buildings differently as well as adding a few new features.

Passage A

D Students helped explain the changes to families. They made a notice showing where the cooler rooms and shaded areas were. The sports timetable moved some outdoor lessons to the morning, when the playground was less hot. During an official heat warning, staff followed the school's safety plan and changed activities as necessary. The students' measurements helped with everyday planning, but they did not replace official advice. Families received messages about timetable changes through the usual school communication system, rather than through a new app.

E After the blinds were installed, the class repeated the measurements. The western rooms were cooler than before, but the students were careful about their conclusion. Some days in the second period were also cloudier. They decided to compare more days with similar weather before saying exactly how much the blinds helped. The project taught them that a useful answer may need several checks. Their final display included both the improvements they had observed and the questions they still wanted to investigate.
