A Better Working Day Passage A

A Bright Paper is a small company that makes notebooks. Its forty employees were busy, but orders sometimes left the workshop late. The manager first thought that longer working hours would solve the problem. Before changing the timetable, she asked workers to keep a simple diary for one week. They wrote down their main tasks and the things that interrupted them. The diaries showed that repeated meetings and unclear messages took time away from making and checking products. Working harder was not the only possible answer.

B The company began a trial lasting three months. It replaced two short weekly meetings with one written update. Each team could read the update when it suited their work, and questions went into a shared notebook. A short meeting still took place on Monday to deal with problems that needed discussion. Staff did not have to attend simply to hear information they could read. The manager also asked people to put important details together in one message instead of sending several small messages about the same order.

C Workers chose a quiet hour each morning for tasks that required concentration. During that hour, ordinary messages could wait. However, the customer desk remained open because someone still needed to answer urgent calls. Staff took turns at the desk, and the person on duty had a quiet hour later. A sign showed who was answering calls that day. This arrangement did not remove every interruption, but it gave most people a predictable period when they could finish careful work without repeatedly changing tasks.

A Better Working Day Passage A

D At the end of the trial, more orders were leaving on time. Employees said they could check the notebooks more carefully before packing them. Yet the manager did not claim that the new routine explained every improvement. The company had also received fewer large orders during the trial. She compared work on similar orders and asked the packing team about mistakes. Those checks gave a clearer picture than counting the total number of notebooks alone. The company wanted reliable work, not simply a larger daily number.

E Most staff wanted to keep the quiet hour, but two workers preferred the old routine. They liked asking questions as soon as a problem appeared. The team agreed that urgent questions should still be asked immediately, while ordinary ones could go in the shared notebook. New employees also received extra help until they understood their tasks. The final plan kept useful parts of the trial while allowing these exceptions. Bright Paper learned that a better timetable should support people doing the work, rather than become another rule that makes work difficult.

Questions 16-18 Follow the model

Use the model to help you express different content in 4 connected sentences. Write key words, then record your answer.

16. Compare two delivery services. Explain a trade-off.

Model: Service A is faster than Service B. It also costs more. I would use it for urgent orders. For other orders, I would choose the cheaper service.

17. Explain how a business could use less of one resource. Compare the old and new method.

Model: The shop prints every receipt. Digital receipts would use less paper. Customers could receive them by email. The shop should still offer paper when someone needs it.

18. Describe a stock problem and a practical next step. Use a phrasal verb.

Model: The bakery has run out of large bags. Several customers want large orders. The owner will call another supplier. She will find out when more bags can arrive.
