Reading Homework 1

Book 2 Unit 8

Passage A

A Hillford is a town where a school astronomy club meets on Friday evenings. Members enjoy looking at the Moon and learning the names of bright stars. Recently, they found that lights from shops made it harder to see the sky near their meeting place. They did not ask the town to switch off every lamp. People still needed to find their way home safely. Instead, the club asked whether some lights could illuminate the ground without sending so much light upwards.

B The students began with a simple survey. They visited three places with their teacher on the same clear evening and counted the stars they could see in a chosen part of the sky. The school field was darker than the shopping street, but a farm outside town gave the clearest view. They wrote down the time and weather as well as the results. Their teacher explained that clouds and the Moon's brightness could affect another night's count, so comparing different places required care.

C The council agreed to test covered lamps along one path. The covers directed light down towards people walking below. Shop owners also turned off bright signs after closing, while keeping entrance lights on when staff were still inside. The plan did not require anyone to work in darkness. Before making a permanent change, the council asked evening walkers whether they could see the path clearly. A few people pointed out a dark corner, and an extra lamp was placed there.

Passage A

D The club invited families to an evening on the school field. Students prepared a short map of the sky and used a telescope to show visitors the Moon. They asked families to let their eyes adjust to the dark before looking for less bright stars. A teacher led the activity, and visitors stayed in the marked area. When clouds covered the sky, the group used photographs to explain what they had hoped to observe. Bad weather changed the activity, but did not end the evening.

E A month later, the club repeated its survey on another clear evening. More stars were visible near the changed lamps, although the students did not claim that every difference came from the new lighting. They continued recording conditions and collected comments from walkers. The council would use both kinds of information when deciding what to do next. The project connected an interest in space with everyday choices on the ground. Better lighting could help people enjoy the night sky while still making the town practical to use.
