Reading Homework 1

Book 3 Unit 4

Passage A

A In the coastal town of San Estel, older boat builders were worried that few young people knew their craft. Fishing families now bought different kinds of boats, and the old workshop was used less often. A teacher suggested bringing students there for a short course. The aim was not to train a whole class of professional boat builders. It was to help teenagers understand a local skill by trying a small part of the work themselves.

B The teacher and builders planned six afternoon visits. Students first listened to stories about how the boats had been used. They then examined a simple model and learned the names of its main parts. Instead of beginning with a full-sized boat, each pair made a small wooden box using one joining method from the workshop. This gave them a manageable task with a clear result, while introducing a skill that also appeared in traditional boat construction.

C The builders had to change how they explained their work. Experienced workers often judged a piece of wood by sight or touch without describing every step. Students needed a slower demonstration and time to ask questions. One builder used two sample joints to show the difference between a close fit and a loose one. The teacher photographed the stages, with permission, and added short labels. Students could check these pictures when they forgot what to do next.

Passage A

D Not everything in the workshop was included in the course. Some tools could be used only by the builders, and students worked within a clearly marked area. A few families also asked that their private stories should not appear on the school's website. The teacher agreed that material for public display would be checked with the people who had shared it. Learning about a tradition did not mean that every object, technique or personal memory had to become public.

E At the final meeting, students showed their boxes and explained one decision they had made. Some boxes were uneven, but the builders looked for careful work and an understanding of the joining method. Parents could ask students about the process instead of only admiring the finished objects. Two students later asked to spend another afternoon at the workshop. Most did not want a career in the craft, yet several said they now noticed details in old boats that they had previously ignored.

F The school kept the course small for its second year. It paid the builders for their time and included preparation in the timetable, rather than expecting volunteers to do everything. The workshop did not return to its earlier level of business. Nevertheless, the programme created a new reason for the space and its knowledge to be used. The tradition remained connected to real people and practical work, not only to photographs displayed in a corridor.
