Wedding Gifts, Told in Many Voices Passage B

A The Harbour Museum received boxes of wedding gifts from families whose celebrations had taken place over more than sixty years. Curators did not arrange the objects simply from oldest to newest. They first invited donors to explain why a particular teapot, blanket or envelope mattered. In some families, a gift had been chosen by neighbours; in others, money had replaced household objects as young couples moved into smaller homes. The exhibition began with this change in practice rather than treating one earlier custom as the only authentic tradition.

B Each donor could make a short recording in the language they normally used at home. A museum interviewer then prepared a written transcript and returned it to the speaker for checking. When an account included a local expression without an English equivalent, the display used the original word with a short explanation instead of pretending that one translation carried every meaning. This process took time, but it prevented a curator's first interpretation from becoming the final version of a family memory.

C One apparent misunderstanding concerned an embroidered cloth. A visitor assumed it was a gift made for the bride, but the donor explained that it had been brought by an aunt to remember a relative who could not attend the wedding. The museum added this explanation beside the object and recorded the visitor's question for a discussion activity. The event showed why a material object could not speak for itself: the same cloth might look decorative to one person and carry a loss or family connection for another.

Wedding Gifts, Told in Many Voices Passage B

D The exhibition also had to avoid presenting only happy memories. Some speakers described joy at receiving practical help, while others remembered pressure to give expensive presents. The museum placed short contrasting extracts beside a shared display of envelopes and kitchen items. It did not count which opinion was more common and announce a single conclusion. Instead, visitors could listen to several accounts and compare how age, migration and household circumstances changed the meaning of a gift.

E At the opening, younger visitors asked why some couples had received tools while others received cash. Older contributors pointed out that neither pattern had disappeared completely. The museum planned to add new recordings each year, with permission, rather than close the story at the opening date. Its final panel described wedding gifts as objects linked to changing social expectations and personal memories. It did not claim to represent every community, but it made space for people to correct, add to or disagree with the display. Contributors could choose whether their name, a first name, or no name appeared beside a recording. This gave families some control over a public account while allowing the museum to explain whose perspective, rather than an anonymous authority, shaped a particular memory.

Questions 11-15 Order and speak

Put sentences A-C in order. Record the opening, then read all three sentences in the correct order. Do not read the letters.

11. Explain your view of keeping a local event.

Opening: There is a local event I would like to keep.

A	For that reason, I think it should continue.
B	Some people want to stop the event.
C	However, it gives neighbours a chance to meet.

12. Respond to a concern about the cost of gifts.

Opening: A friend raised an interesting point about gifts.

A	I understand her concern about cost.
B	My friend says gifts are too commercial.
C	Still, a small personal gift can be meaningful.

13. Suggest how hosts can help visitors understand a greeting.

Opening: A little explanation can help when people first meet.

A	Hosts can explain the rules politely.
B	This helps everyone feel more comfortable.
C	Visitors may not know local greeting rules.

14. Explain why a school should announce a cultural day early.

Opening: We are planning a cultural day at school.

A	Therefore, the school should announce it early.
B	Students need time to prepare their displays.
C	The school wants a larger cultural day.

15. Give your opinion about a change to a custom.

Opening: I do not think every change to a tradition is a problem.
