Passage A

A Rivermount's teachers noticed that some older students often arrived late for their first lesson. A student survey suggested several reasons, including long journeys, late bedtimes and morning responsibilities at home. The school did not assume that one change would solve every problem. It decided to test a later starting time for one term, while collecting information about attendance and how families managed the new routine.

B Lessons for the older students began at nine instead of half past eight. The total teaching time stayed the same because the school day also finished thirty minutes later. Students whose families needed the earlier arrival time could still enter the library before lessons. Staff explained this arrangement in advance, so parents did not have to guess when the building would be open. Younger students continued with their usual timetable during the trial.

C The school recorded late arrivals each week and asked students to keep a short sleep diary on selected days. The diary was private: teachers collected class totals, not names beside individual bedtime records. Students also noted their morning journey. A late bus could affect punctuality even when someone had gone to bed early. These details helped the school look beyond a simple choice between students being careful or careless about getting to lessons.

D Fewer older students arrived late during the trial. Many said that the later start made their mornings less rushed, but some reported little difference. A few simply stayed up later because they knew they could leave home later. Teachers therefore discussed daily routines as well as the timetable. The school avoided promising that a later start would automatically improve every student's results. The trial provided information about this group during one term, not proof about every school.

Passage A

E The later finish created other difficulties. Some students reached their sports clubs too late, while others needed to collect younger brothers or sisters. The school met families to discuss these problems and asked local clubs whether one practice session could move. It could not meet every request. However, writing down the conflicts helped staff see which students were affected and whether a small change could help, rather than treating all complaints as resistance to a new idea.

F At the end of the term, the school shared the attendance results alongside the family feedback. It proposed another trial with a small adjustment to the afternoon timetable, rather than making an immediate permanent decision. The library would continue to open early, and transport arrangements would be checked again. Rivermount's main lesson was that a useful timetable had to fit students' lives outside the classroom too. Reviewing both benefits and difficulties was more helpful than counting support for or against one starting time.
