Reading Homework 1

Book 3 Unit 6

Passage A

A A design class looked for ideas in the natural world. Students examined seeds, leaves and shells, paying attention to shape rather than colour alone. One group became interested in seeds that caught on a piece of cloth. Under a magnifying glass, they could see small hooks. They wondered whether a similar shape could help them create a fastening for a reusable bag. The observation suggested a starting point, not a finished product.

B The students first drew a much larger version of a hook so that they could discuss its shape. They made models from several materials and tried attaching them to different fabrics. A stiff model held firmly but was difficult to release. A softer one was easier to open but sometimes came loose when the bag moved. These early tests showed that copying an interesting natural shape did not automatically produce an object suitable for everyday use.

C To compare the versions, the group agreed on a simple test. Each fastening held the same weight while a student lifted the bag ten times. They recorded whether it stayed closed and how easily another person could open it afterwards. The order of the versions was changed between tests, so the same model was not always tried first. The group also repeated the test with a second person instead of trusting one user's experience.

Passage A

D The best result came from a version with shorter hooks. However, it caught on a loose thread in one fabric. The team noted the problem rather than hiding it because the other results were good. It changed the edge of the fastening and tried it again. The new test used the same weight and fabrics, allowing the students to see whether this particular change helped. A different test would have made the comparison harder to interpret.

E The teacher then asked about the people who might use the bag. Someone carrying shopping could need to open it with one hand, and a small child might find a tight fastening difficult. The students invited several volunteers to try the model with ordinary objects inside. Their comments added information that the repeated lifting test had not provided. A product could remain closed under a weight but still be awkward to use in a normal situation.

F The final display included the seed, the early models and a record of the changes. The students described the fastening as inspired by nature, not identical to it. They had changed both the size and the material to suit a human task. They also explained that the class had tested only a few samples, so it could not promise how the fastening would behave after years of use. Nature had provided a useful question; observation, comparison and revision had developed the answer.
