Passage A - How a Large City Helps People Find Their Way

A Tokyo is Japan's capital and a large, modern city. It has a large population, so many people travel across the city every day. Traffic can make a road journey slow. An area near a major road can also be noisy. For a visitor, it is useful to know a simple way to find the right train.

B Tokyo Metro is one part of the city's transport system. It has nine subway lines. The lines take people to different parts of the city. They can help people reach a different area of the city. Local people may know the system well, but visitors can need help when they use it for the first time. Each line has its own page, where people can look at the stations in order.

C Tokyo Metro gives every station a station number. The number has two parts. First, there is a letter for the subway line. Then there is a number for the station. The number is inside a coloured circle. This gives the map a clear design and makes the information easier to find than in a long list of names. The usual line names and station names are still displayed beside the numbers. Passengers therefore have more than one way to recognise a stop.

D Station numbers can help a passenger make a choice. A person can find the letter for the correct line and then look for the station number. The numbers also show how many stations there are before a transfer station. This is useful for a trip to the city centre or another part of Tokyo. They can also help a passenger check if the train is going in the right direction.

E Before a journey, people can check the official map. They can also search for a station by name or number on the Tokyo Metro website. The Fare and Transfer Search shows the fare for a destination. It can help a passenger find a cheap route. This gives the passenger clear information before the journey starts and can save time in a busy city. The site also provides an English subway map that people can download. They can save a copy to check while planning their journey, instead of relying only on remembering station names. A large city can feel difficult at first, especially when there are many trains and many people. However, the station-number system gives visitors an opportunity to make a journey in small steps. They can choose a line, find a number and check the direction. This simple system helps people use a large city with more confidence.
