Passage B - A Second Step for Your Account

A A password is often the first lock on an online account, but it is not the only possible lock. The US Cybersecurity and Infrastructure Security Agency, or CISA, says that strong passwords alone are no longer enough when used by themselves. A person may use the same password in more than one place, or an attacker may try to obtain it through a false message. For this reason, many services offer multifactor authentication, usually called MFA. It asks for two or more ways to show that the person signing in is really the account holder.

B MFA can add a second check after a password. The first proof might be something a person knows, such as a password typed on a keyboard. The next proof could be something they have, such as a code from an app on a smartphone, or something they are, such as a fingerprint. A code sent to an email address or phone is another familiar method. Each method works differently, but the central idea is simple: one lost or guessed password should not automatically open an account.

C This extra step can improve account security because an attacker who has one factor may still fail the second check. CISA explains that MFA is useful for email, financial services, social media, online stores and gaming or streaming services. These examples matter because one person may use several accounts in a day. Instead of treating all accounts as equally important, users can begin with accounts that hold valuable details or can be used to reset other passwords.

Passage B - A Second Step for Your Account

D Different checks have different strengths. A physical security key can be connected to or tapped on a device. An authenticator app, a computer program, may create a new number regularly, while another app may ask a user to match a number shown on a sign-in screen. A fingerprint can be useful too, often together with another method. Some services offer an authenticator app as a download. An app code may be valid for only a short period and used once. A password should remain secret. The extra check can reduce the chance that an unauthorised person can enter.

E MFA does not remove every risk or replace careful thinking. People still need to notice unexpected sign-in requests and protect the devices they use. A service may collect account details for a real purpose, but users should check which service is asking and why. Security choices can affect daily habits: signing in may take a few more seconds, yet it can add protection to important accounts. The useful lesson is to understand the extra check and use it where it is available.
