Passage B - When Thunder Is a Warning

A A storm can change quickly. A bright flash is lightning and the later sound is thunder, but hearing the sound is more than an interesting weather detail. NOAA says that if people hear thunder, lightning is near enough to strike. Rain does not have to be falling where a person stands. This is important because a storm may look distant while its electrical danger can still reach an outdoor area.

B The safest response is to move indoors immediately. NOAA identifies a substantial building with electricity or plumbing as safe shelter. An enclosed, metal-topped vehicle with windows up is another option when a building is unavailable. A picnic shelter, a tent and an isolated tree are not safe choices. The aim is to decide before an outdoor activity begins where a safe place can be found, rather than searching as temperatures drop and the first flash appears.

C People sometimes wait for rain to fall or for a storm to seem directly overhead. That is not a reliable plan. NOAA explains that many people struck by lightning are in rain-free areas miles from a thunderstorm. A flash can strike far from the heaviest rain. For this reason, no place outdoors is safe when a thunderstorm is in the area. A clear warning sign is enough to stop a game, walk or other outdoor plan.

Passage B - When Thunder Is a Warning

D Inside a safe building, people should stay away from windows, doors, plumbing and corded electrical equipment. Water and wires can carry electricity. In a vehicle, windows should be raised and people should avoid contact with paths that lead outside. These steps may sound strict, but lightning is a dangerous weather hazard. An electric shock can cause serious injury, even when people are inside a building. The precautions above reduce that risk by limiting contact with electrical paths.

E A safe plan also includes waiting. NOAA advises people to remain in shelter for at least 30 minutes after the last sound of thunder. This does not mean every storm will last the same time. It gives a minimum period after the final warning. Checking a forecast before leaving and knowing the nearest shelter can make a person more careful. Weather knowledge is most useful when it changes a decision before danger arrives. A group can agree who will check forecasts and who will lead people to shelter. This avoids a delay when several people are unsure what to do. The plan should be shared early before the sky changes.
