Passage B - From Interests to Career Ideas

A A short quiz can begin a career conversation, but a real assessment often asks more questions. The O*NET Interest Profiler is a public career-exploration tool developed for the United States Department of Labor. Its current web version has 30 questions, while a paper short form has 60. People can complete it online. The tool asks which work activities a person might enjoy, then connects the answers with more than one occupation.

B O*NET measures six interests. Realistic means practical, hands-on work. Investigative means thinking, finding facts, and solving problems. Artistic means creating or designing. Social means helping, teaching, and talking with people. Enterprising means leading, deciding, and doing business. Conventional means working with data, details, rules, and regular routines. This system uses six defined interests. Words such as people, information, things, and ideas can describe broad preferences, but they are not the profiler's six official category names.

C Everyday choices can provide clues. Someone who enjoys repairing a bicycle as a hobby may notice a Realistic interest. A student who likes researching a difficult question may score higher in Investigative work. Keeping records neat may point towards Conventional activities. Enjoying music does not automatically make someone an artist, and helping one friend does not decide a career. The questions look for a pattern across many activities rather than one favourite evening.

Passage B - From Interests to Career Ideas

D After the questions, the user receives a score for each interest. The result can suggest careers from a collection of over 900 O*NET occupations. On My Next Move, career pages also show preparation levels and details about the work. A student can open one section, compare several careers, and organize further research. This turns a broad preference into names that a learner can investigate, compare, and discuss with an adult. A high score does not promise that every suggested job will suit the person. Education, ability, values, and local opportunities still matter.

E The official score report gives an important warning. Results are for exploring careers, not for employment or hiring decisions. A sensible goal is to build a list and investigate it. Students can read how employers advertise real openings, check the required training, and talk with people who do the work. They should not apply for a job only because a quiz suggested it. A second check can include school subjects, training time, working conditions, and conversations with workers. O*NET recommends asking a teacher or career counsellor for more advice. Used this way, an interest profile opens choices instead of closing them.
