Passage C - Using AI to Warn About River Floods

A A river can rise after heavy rain and flood nearby homes and roads. A warning before the water arrives gives people time to prepare. Yet some places have little local information about river levels, which makes early warnings difficult. In 2018, Google began a flood forecasting pilot, a test to predict river floods, in India. Its goal was to help communities receive useful information before a river flood. The work brought computer researchers together with people who understood rivers and local warning systems.

B A flood forecasting product does not answer questions like a chatbot. It uses patterns in information to forecast floods. To run its computer models, programs that represent real-world processes, Google uses weather forecasts and satellite images taken from space that are available to the public. Its system combines two models. One estimates how much water will flow in a river. The other estimates which areas could be covered by water and how deep it might become. A forecast is a possible result based on available information, not a promise that events will happen exactly as predicted.

Passage C - Using AI to Warn About River Floods

C In 2022, Google introduced Flood Hub to organize flood forecasts. The platform displays the information on a map. The Centre for Humanitarian Data later became a partner in this work. The company first offered the platform in 20 countries. In May 2023, Google announced an expansion to 80 countries, including places in Africa, Asia, Europe and the Americas. The forecasts covered areas where about 460 million people lived. At that time, some forecasts looked as far as seven days ahead. A longer warning can give individuals and organisations more time to consider their next steps.

D The project depends on more than a computer screen. Google Research worked with universities, governments and aid organisations to improve the system. It also worked with the Red Cross to share useful forecasts. Google has made some flood alerts available through Search, Maps and Android notifications as well as Flood Hub. Local organisations can use such information while they plan their own response. People should also follow advice from local authorities, who understand conditions and make decisions for their area.

Passage C - Using AI to Warn About River Floods

E Researchers need to check how well a model works. In 2024, a research team reported tests it had set up to compare its forecasts with an existing global system. Google also explained that some places lacked enough data to check forecast quality. In those areas, it added a section with extra forecasts for researchers and experts. The team continues to improve its models. This example shows one use of AI beyond online conversation. The technology can provide information, but people still need to judge it and decide how to act.
