Passage A - How a Guide Dog Team Learns to Travel

A Ben Underwood, the teenager in Reading 1, moved through the world by listening to echoes. Guide dogs offer another form of independent travel for people who are blind. The dog does not choose the destination. The person knows the route and gives directions, while the dog helps the team move around obstacles and other hazards.

B The partnership starts long before two team members meet. The Seeing Eye places puppies with volunteer raisers at about eight weeks old. The volunteers teach home manners, basic obedience, and social skills. At about one year old, the dogs return to the school. Instructors then train them for four months in guide work.

C Instruction must be careful and patient. Guide Dogs in the United Kingdom says that positive reinforcement is central to its work. Trainers reward actions they want the dog to repeat. Its policy rejects physical punishment and says dogs should be treated with respect as partners and problem solvers.

D Next comes matching. Guide Dogs considers the owner's daily needs, walking speed, height, routes, transport, home, and work. It also studies each dog's speed and way of working. A quiet dog may suit one person, while a faster dog may suit another. A sensible match makes movement comfortable for both.

E Then the new partners learn together. Guide Dogs provides about five weeks of instruction adapted to each pair. At first, both may need time to become confident. The handler practises commands and routes. The dog learns the handler's movement. An instructor checks progress and changes lessons when necessary.

Passage A - How a Guide Dog Team Learns to Travel

F The human remains in charge of decisions. The Seeing Eye explains that a handler listens to traffic before giving a command to cross. An intelligent dog can refuse if moving forward would put the team in danger. It can stop at stairs, indicate a door handle, and guide the handler through a crowded place.

G Life together also brings responsibility. The owner must look after the dog's health and welfare, provide exercise, and follow care advice. The public can help by staying calm and asking before offering assistance. Grabbing a harness or distracting a working dog can interfere with the team's movement.

H Successful travel depends on communication, practice, and trust. Guide Dogs offers continuing support after instruction, because a route or routine can change. The dog needs clear information from its handler, and the handler needs a reliable response from the dog. Independence here is a shared skill built by two partners.
